

A lookout trench on the American front in Lorraine with sentries on duty. This is one of the most dangerous and important positions on the line, for the men must always be on the alert for enemy activity such as raids, gas attacks and the like.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information.

Another view of the American trenches with a sentry at his post. Our men are rapidly becoming adept at the trench fighting game and the Germans no longer find it easy to fool them or wise to try. Just the other side of the sentry is a dugout entrance.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information.

A first aid station in the trenches. This dugout just behind the American line is used as a dressing station by the hospital division.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information.

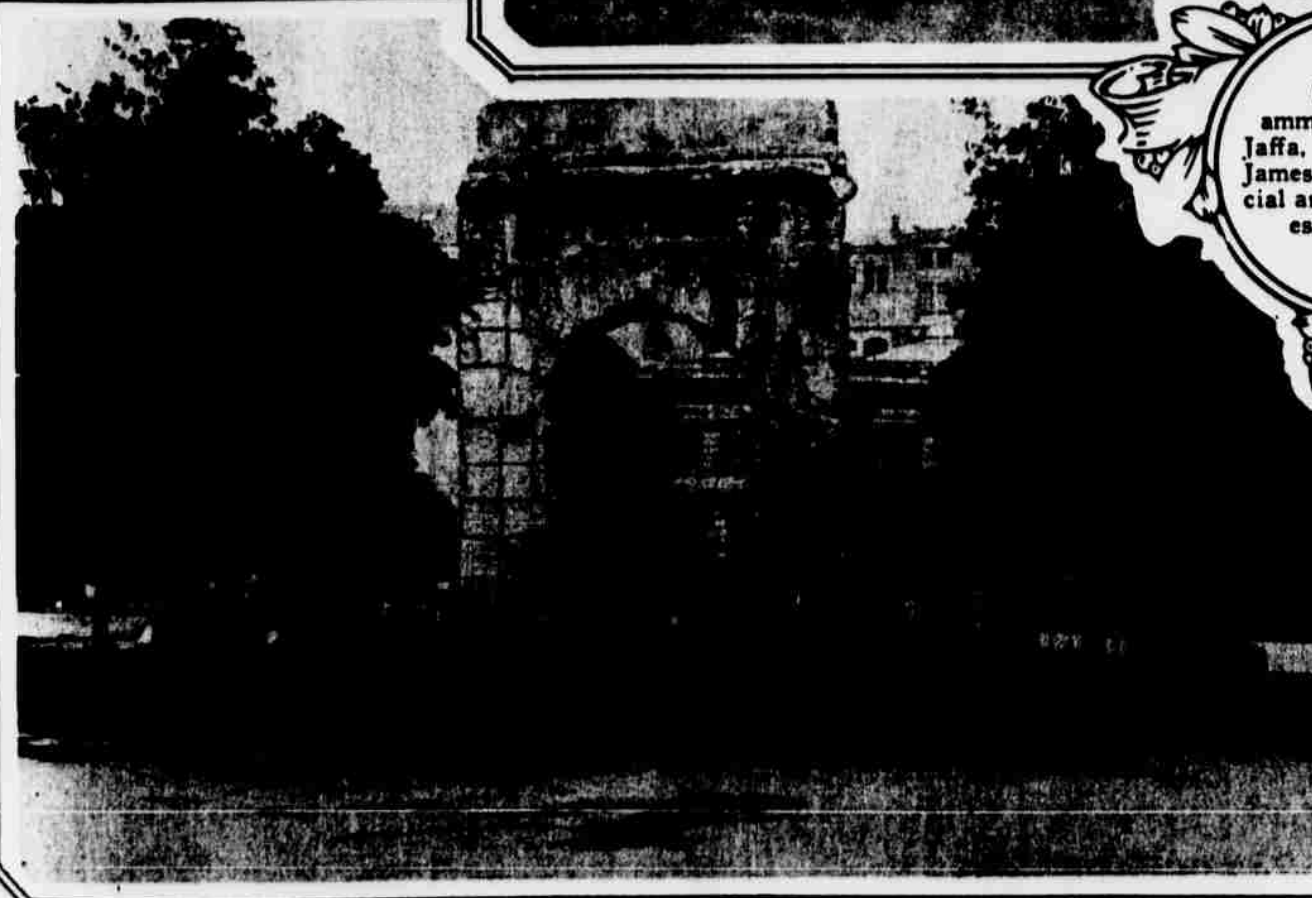

No Man's Land in front of a sector held by Pershing's troops. Opposite here the Germans are reported to be concentrating large forces.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information.

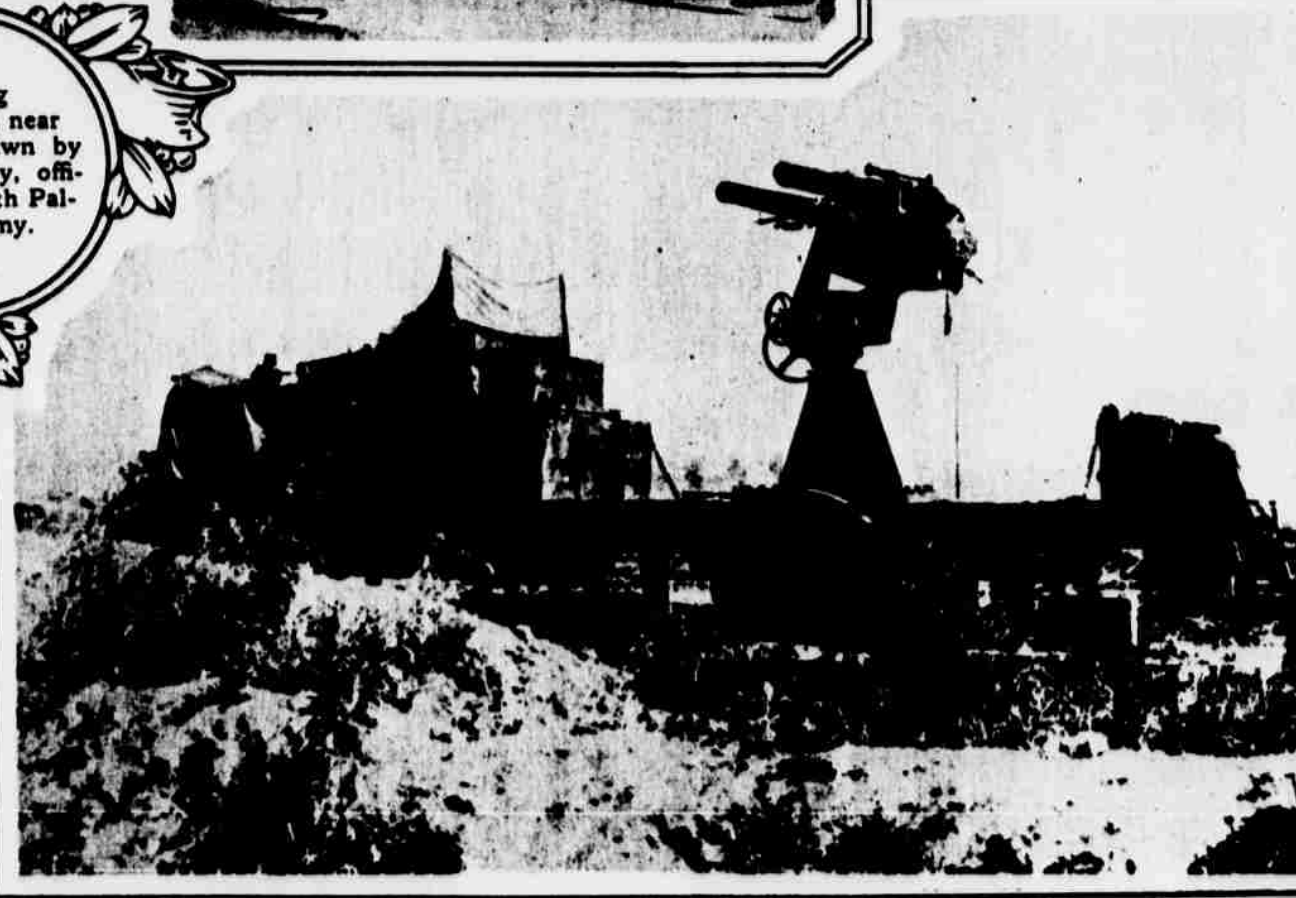

Landing ammunition near Jaffa, as drawn by James McBey, official artist with Palestine army.

Some of America's young warriors at Aix-les-Bains, their recreation centre, with an ancient Roman arch as a background. This masonry was erected in the third century by direction of Lucius Pompeius Capranus.

Photo from International Film.

A new type of British big gun, one of the most recent evolutions in artillery. Mounted on a railway truck, the carriage gives this weapon a much longer range than would be possible fired from the ground.

Photo Press Illustrating Service.